Do I need a whole new roof? Plenty of Cardiff homeowners ask themselves that when a damp patch appears, and the honest answer is often no. Redland Roofing Cardiff is a family-owned roofing contractor with over 30 years in the trade, and John's approach is to tell people what their roof actually needs, not what earns the biggest invoice. Sometimes that's a full replacement. Quite often it's a repair that keeps a sound roof going for years. The decision starts with an honest assessment. On a Victorian terrace in Roath or Splott, a leak might come from a few slipped slates, a cracked lead flashing around the chimney or a blocked valley gutter, none of which calls for stripping the whole roof. On a 1930s semi in Llanishen or Heath, loose ridge tiles or a tired garage felt roof can be dealt with on their own. Replacement starts to make sense when the problems are widespread: slates or tiles failing across large areas, battens rotting, the old underlay perished, or repeated patch repairs that keep failing. At that point, spending more on repairs is usually throwing good money after bad, and John will say so. How the advice is given matters as much as the advice itself. Customers on Google repeatedly roofers cardiff mention John explaining the problem clearly and being patient with questions, however many there are. Photos and videos help a great deal, because most people can't get up on https://keegangjyv619.clearhavendigest.com/posts/tremorfa-and-pengam-green-roofers-cardiff their roof to see for themselves. One landlord living more than 250 miles away was kept up to date with photos throughout. Among roofers in Cardiff, that openness is what lets you make a decision you're comfortable with. When a full replacement is the right answer, the work is thorough. One customer described scaffolding going up, the roof stripped back to the rafters, a new breathable membrane and treated battens fitted, sound tiles reused and damaged ones replaced, and new fascias and gutters added.
