

Yes, a business can pay for flowers sent to overseas clients, provided the gift complies with its own policies and any rules that apply to the recipient. The practical details matter: delivery arrangements, payment records, tax treatment and gift rules can differ across borders.

Arrange delivery in the client's country

Ordering flowers from a florist based in the destination country is often simpler than shipping a bouquet across a border. A local florist can source suitable flowers, prepare them closer to the delivery date and advise on the address and delivery window.

Before ordering, confirm the recipient's name, full address and a phone number the florist can use if delivery is difficult. If the flowers are going to an office, check that the client works there on the chosen day and that the building accepts deliveries. A home address may be more suitable, but only use it if the client has shared it for this purpose.

Ask what happens if the recipient is unavailable and whether the florist can substitute flowers. Availability varies by place and season, so a flexible choice can prevent delays. A short card identifying your business also helps the recipient understand who sent the arrangement and why.

Pay and keep a clear record

A business card or another approved company payment method can make the purchase easier to trace. Before confirming the order, check the final amount in the payment currency and any delivery fee. Your card provider may also apply a currency conversion charge.

Keep the receipt or invoice with enough information to explain the expense. Useful details include:

- The date, amount and currency paid
- The florist's name and the delivery destination
- The client or business relationship involved
- The reason for the gift and any required internal approval

These records help the person handling accounts classify the purchase under the business's own expense rules. They also provide context if the payment is reviewed later. Avoid putting sensitive client details on a shared expense record when a brief description will do.

Do not assume the cost is automatically deductible or that foreign tax on the purchase can be reclaimed. Treatment depends on the business's location, the purpose of the gift and the relevant tax rules. Ask an accountant who knows the business's circumstances how to record it.

Check gift rules and local expectations

Some clients have policies that limit or prohibit gifts from suppliers. Extra care is important if the recipient works for a public body or has a role in a pending purchasing decision. A modest bouquet can still create a problem if it conflicts with a rule or could appear to influence that decision.

Check your company's gift and anti bribery policies before ordering, and ask the client's organisation about its rules if you are unsure. Record any approval required. It is also worth checking local customs around flowers and colours, since their meanings can vary.

A little checking lets the flowers do their intended job: show appreciation without creating an awkward delivery, an unclear expense or an unwanted gift.

You may also like repeat customers for florists