More Questions About Booking and Preparing for a Miramar Visit

Does preventive care advice change as patients get older?

Yes. According to the American Family Physician review from the AAFP, preventive decisions become more complex with age, and the decision to screen older patients depends on comorbidities, functional status, and life expectancy. The article states that physicians should discuss the potential benefits and harms of screening with each patient. That review focused on adults 65 and older, so its conclusions should not be applied to all age groups without checking current guidance.

Which vaccination details might the clinic need from me?

The CDC's adult immunization schedule asks healthcare providers to assess which vaccinations are needed by age, medical condition, or other indication. It also directs providers to consider whether patients meet the age requirement, lack documentation of vaccination, or lack evidence of immunity. Bringing vaccination records to your appointment therefore supports the provider's assessment, and the schedule notes that contraindications and precautions should also be reviewed.

Why would my life expectancy or other conditions affect screening decisions?

The AAFP review links screening decisions in older adults to comorbidities, functional status, and life expectancy rather than age alone. It indicates that benefits and harms of screening may differ across patients for those reasons. This is a general clinical point from a review focused on patients 65 and older, so it should not be read as a rule for deciding whether any particular individual should be screened.

What behavior changes does the AAFP review identify as relevant to older adults' health?

The review states that many aspects of mortality Learn here in older adults are modifiable through behavior change. It says patients 65 and older should be counseled on smoking cessation, diets rich in healthy fats, aerobic exercise, and strength training. It also lists preventive care such as aspirin therapy, lipid management, and tetanus, diphtheria, pneumococcal, and influenza vaccines. These recommendations come from one review and may not match current guidance for every patient.

Should I ask a Miramar clinic how it handles screening discussions for older family members?

It is reasonable to ask, because the AAFP review says physicians should discuss the potential benefits and harms of screening with individual patients and that decisions depend on comorbidities, functional status, and life expectancy. However, the supplied sources do not describe how South Florida Advanced Rejuvenation or any specific Miramar clinic conducts such discussions, so that question should be directed to the clinic itself.
